

WEEK 2:

During one of our classes, our instructor mentioned that in some interviews, you might be asked to continue your introduction in just 25 words. I tried 10 times before finalizing my version. The final introduction, which my instructor approved, is:

"Himanshu, a highly skilled software developer ready for any challenge, whose brilliance has won him many hackathons, will lead our firm to new heights."

In one of our sessions, our teacher asked us what we loved most. Then, he told us a story to think about. The story was about a person lost in a thick forest, feeling scared and alone. In the story, the person faced many hard challenges—once a tiger chased him, another time a bear did, and he even went almost two days without food.

The main idea of the story is that when things get really tough, what you truly want to hear is not a favorite song or kind words, but your own name. Hearing your name reminds you who you are and gives you comfort, hope, and strength to keep going.
