

WEEK 4:

In our last session with our instructor, we had a unique 1 versus 64 discussion on the topic of women empowerment—a session that truly opened our eyes to innovative ways of addressing the challenges women face. Our instructor challenged us to think critically, and many students presented some really thought-provoking points.

One of the ideas discussed was enhancing safety by installing more surveillance cameras in public spaces. The rationale is that the presence of cameras acts as a deterrent to potential offenders, thereby increasing overall security and making women feel safer in their communities.

Another significant proposal was to introduce early self-defense training in schools. Classes in disciplines like judo and karate can empower young girls with practical skills, boost their confidence, and teach them how to handle threatening situations. Early exposure to such training not only strengthens their physical abilities but also nurtures mental resilience.

Additionally, a practical solution put forward was the provision of night bus services exclusively for women. This initiative aims to offer a safe, reliable mode of transport during late hours, reducing the risks associated with traveling alone at night and ensuring that women have secure options to return home.

A more stringent approach that sparked considerable debate was the call for implementing death penalties for individuals convicted of rape and other heinous crimes. While this measure is controversial, it underscores the urgency of creating a legal system that strongly deters sexual violence and protects women from grave injustices.

I also shared some ideas of my own. I drew inspiration from China's social credit system—a mechanism where citizens' behaviors are monitored, and those who violate rules see their credit scores decline. I suggested that a similar system in India could help enforce societal norms and hold individuals accountable for actions that undermine women's safety and dignity. Furthermore, I pointed out an irony in our cultural practices: although we revere the feminine divine, as seen in the worship of goddesses like Devi, there are still alarming reports of rape. This contradiction highlights that while symbolic respect is present, there remains a significant gap in the actual empowerment and protection of women.

Overall, our session was an eye-opener that emphasized the importance of multifaceted approaches to women empowerment. By combining enhanced safety No references or "Resume" as a heading – Keep it direct and to the point.

Following this format will help you create a clear, professional, and effective resume that highlights your strengths concisely.

measures, early educational initiatives, dedicated services, and a robust legal framework, we can work towards a society where women truly feel secure and empowered.